"Tariffs and Growth: Heterogeneous Effects by Economic Structure".

This article presents evidence that the impact of tariffs on GDP per capita is mediated by economic structure. I use a panel of 161 countries from 1960 to 2019 to study the impact of changes in average tariff rates on GDP per capita. Using a local projections difference-in-differences (LP-DiD) approach allows me to flexibly control for the surge in GDP that precedes tariff reductions, which if ignored could bias the estimates, and to estimate medium-term dynamic effects. The results, consistent with a specific strand of the trade theory literature, establish that the tariff-growth nexus is contingent on economic structure: tariff reductions led to lower GDP per capita for nonmanufacturer countries, but higher GDP per capita for manufacturers. Additionally, the effects are persistent even twenty years after tariff reductions. The validity of the baseline estimates is confirmed by several robustness checks, especially the control for relevant confounders in the tariffs-growth nexus and a clean controls analysis aimed to address biases from heterogeneity as highlighted by recent difference-in-differences literature. The results seem to be driven by heterogeneous effects in productivity and capital accumulation, in turn related to changes in the manufacturing share of GDP.
